The Prevention of Fires.

FROM A CIRCULAR ISSUED BY THE HOME INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK.

STOVES AND STOVE PIPES.—All woodwork or lath and plaster partitions within 18 inches of stoves, or within 10 inches of stove-pipes, should be protected with metal (tin or galvanized iron preferred), with an air space of one half inch between the metal and the surface to be protected. Good brick platforms or sheets of metal should be used to protect the floor under each stove. All stove pipes should be so erected that each joint will overlap toward the stove, be firmly riveted and well supported, frequently inspected and cleaned. Where stove-pipes are exposed to moisture they corrode rapidly, and a seemingly sound pipe is frequently found to be but a shell, upon the application of pressure from the fingers. Test them.

Where stove-pipes pass through floors or partitions, they should be provided with a double metal collar or tube, with an inch air space between the plates, and be long enough to reach through the floor or partition, with flanges for support having numerous perforations communicating with the air space to admit of the escape of the heat. Stove-pipes passing into or through attics, or other unfrequented places, should be very often and carefully looked after.

Be careful to observe that wooden fire-boards are not used, and that all unused pipe-holes in chimneys and flues are properly stopped with metal. Do not forget to look at the flue in the attic for an open pipe-hole, particularly in country stores and farm-houses.

Ashts should always be kept in metal receptacles, never in wood, nor should they be allowed to accumulate in cellars, attics, etc., or piled against buildings, out-houses, fences, or near rubbish, as a latent spark may find sufficient unconsumed material to feed upon, until reaching the outer air it ignites such combustible material as may be near it.

FURNACES.—To insure even ordinary safety in the use of furnaces, whether hot-air, hot-water or steam, they should be placed on a solid foundation of brick or stone, with brick, stone, or metal not less than 36 inches wide in front of the ash-pit. The dome or top of the furnace and its smoke-pipe should not be less than 18 or 20 inches from unprotected woodwork, or lath and plaster; its side walls at least 12 inches and its hot-air flues at least 8 or 10 inches from unprotected combustible material. Hot-air flues should be constructed of IX bright tin, and where they pass within wooden, or lath and plaster partitions, they should be double, with an air space of at least one-half inch between the inner and outer flues. All registers should be set in soap-stone frames not less than two inches wide, well bedded in plaster of Paris.

Register boxes passing through floors should be made of IX tin, with joint or floor timbers framed around them to leave a space of from 2 to 3 inches, according to size of the register, the exposed woodwork to be covered with tin on all sides, extending from under the soapstone frame to and under the ceiling below. The cold-air trunk or inlet should be of metal, having a wire net or grating at its outer opening, to prevent the entrance of inflammable matter. The use of wooden trunks for air inlets is extremely dangerous, as a reversal of the draft is liable to occur in some stages of the weather, in which case sparks might be carried into the trunk and a fire ensue. An accident of this kind is more liable to occur when, from forcing a fire in the furnace, its lining has become burned through, leaving holes through which live coals may fall into the surrounding air chamber and ignite any inflammable matter or dust that may have accumulated there. In addition to the above mentioned trouble from a burned-out lining, fire may be readily communicated through the hot-air flues and registers under the conditions above mentioned. Under any system of heating using registers, at least one of the registers should be continually kept open, either by removal of the valve or by securely wiring it so as to prevent its being closed. Be careful to examine the smoke-pipe for defects and the chimney for undue heat near woodwork.

LITERARY NOTES.

A Torn Bank-Note.

Tattered and torn, yet a welcome guest in bravest company and in stateliest hall, Nor scorned by most fastidious of them all; By daintiest jewelled finger kindly pressed, Though soiled from grimy factory or stall; Purveyor of the banquet and the ball, And poor man's loaf; prince like a beggar dressed! Meseems from these some words of warning fall, Since sovereign worth can show itself so small, To value not the virtue by the vest: A workman's garb may clothe a royal breast, A dim dull seaboard hide a weapon keen, The shrine may glow behind a curtain mean, And hands of horn disguise a king or queen.

—Mr. A. D. F. Randolph is well known as a publisher, and he ought to be equally well known as a poet. In 1866 he gave to the world a small volume of "Verses," which now is reissued with the addition of a number of poems written since then. His poetry is chiefly religious in character, and in its simplicity of form, uniform nobility of sentiment, frequent pathos, and adaptation to interest and benefits minds of every class, it is conspicuous above most which we have occasion to read. (Scribner's Sons, $1.00)

"The novelist's profession," says the Boston Post, "is apparently becoming hereditary. Not to speak of Miss Thackeray, Mr. Julian Hawthorne, and other well-known instances, a daughter of Mr. Howells is making ready to try her hand at fiction; a daughter of Mrs. A. D. T. Whitney has a novel in press; and a sister of Mr. E. P. Roe will soon give the world a novel. It may be added that Mr. J. H. McCarthy, a son of Mr. Justin McCarthy, is about to publish a story.

"The Historian was told the other day," says the Boston Evening Record, "a local story of Thackeray, which he is sure has never been printed. Thackeray, though he satirized snobbery with a pen of fire, appreciated the advantages of high rank and all that it implies, and he did not hesitate to write that even the heart of a stern moralist would throb with pleasure if he could be seen walking down Pall Mall arm-in-arm between two dukes. While standing in the window of the fashionable Somerset Club in Boston, looking out upon the passers by, Thackeray said to a friend: 'I haven't seen in this country any men with the stamp of high social caste—such men as combine brains and blood in the British peerage. Have you no such men in America? The Boston club man replied that we had, and was going on to illustrate the subject, when Thackeray's quick eye caught sight of two dignified and courtly-looking gentlemen walking arm-in-arm on the opposite sidewalk. 'There,' he said, 'are the sort of men I mean. They look as if they were dukes!' The great writer had seen two of the most democratic of Bostonians, both of whom, however, had more brains and dignity than most wearers of coronets. They were Edmund Quincy and Wendell Phillips!"

The March number of Lippincott's Monthly Magazine gives liberal instalments of the two serials, which increase in interest as the title is further developed. Brander Matthews contributes one of his most ingenious short stories, "Perchance to Dream," ending in a dramatic surprise. "Song-Games and Myth Dramas at Washington," by W. H. Babcock, is a careful study of the rhymes and games current among the children at the national capital. The article forms a valuable supplement to Newell's Songs and Songs of American Children. Laurence Hutton writes a critical and historical account of "The American Play," and his views on the subject will probably provoke much lively discussion. "The One Pioneer of Terra del Fuego," by Randle Holme, is a thrilling narrative of a little known episode in modern travel, the story of Thomas Thorold, who, in 1876, fell into the hands of the savages of Terra del Fuego, and after witnessing all the cruelties which they inflicted upon their enemies was allowed to return to civilization in order that he might acquaint the white man with the horrors had seen. There are poems by Frank Dempster Sherman, Helen Gray Cook, Clinton Scolland, and John B. Tabb. In the "Monthly Gossip" W. H. B. discusses the question whether New York is our literary capital, and vigorously attacks the conclusions at which Brander Matthews arrived in the January Lippincott's. Other topics of current interest are treated by other contributors to this department.

The quotation, "Word for word, without a book," that appears upon the title page of Mr. W. H. Davenport Adams' "Concordance to the Plays of Shakespeare" suggests, in brief, the purpose of the editor. Having had no intention to make an index of all the important words used by Shakespeare, Mr. Adams might better have stamped the cover of his book:—An Index of Ready Reference to the Phraseology of Shakespeare. While Mr. Adams' work is open to improvements, his labor of love, as a reference book to the dramas of Shakespeare must prove to be a useful addition to the libraries of students of Shakespearean literature; and it will be invaluable to all readers of the great dramatist who cannot possess the costly and more bulky concordances of Mrs. Clark and Mrs. Furness, and of earlier compilers. Obscure words found in the text are oftentimes thoughtfully explained by the use of foot notes. This work of Mr. Adams may be called a companion volume to Mr. John Bartlett's Shakespearean Phrase Book, which is an Index to the thoughts of Shakespeare. Mr. Adams' book contains about five hundred pages, closely printed; the type is remarkably legible, and the arrangement such as to allow of no wasted room. The important thoughts that are quoted are given in full, so that no time need be lost in turning from the Index to the Dramas. The size of the Concordance is uniform with the library edition of Howard Staunton's Shakespeare. (8vo., cloth, $3.00; George Routledge & Sons.)

Kate Greenaway has made no prettier book than her "Marigold Garden" that has been issued during the present season. Scarcely can enough praise be given to the quaint and charming figures that have been faultlessly printed in colors by Edmund Evans. Miss Greenaway's work is not limited to the picture portion of the book. The rhymes are hers, and they display much grace and fancy of imagination. In one of these, on the last page, the artist-author gives promise of not allowing "Marigold Garden" to be the final work. She says:—

Fairy Blue Eyes,
And Fairy Brown
And dear little Golden Curls,
Look down.
I say "Good bye,"
"Good bye" with no pain—
Till some happy day
We meet again!

From among the many imitable designs between the pretty covers, it is difficult to select one or more that excel the others; but peculiarly suggestive and pretty are "When You and I grow up," "The Little Queen's Coming," and "The Little Jumping Girls." The work of the printers is beyond criticism. (George Routledge & Sons, $2.00.)

No more important announcement regarding periodical literature has been made for many years than that of the "New Princeton Review." It will occupy an entirely new field, covered by no other periodical of Europe or America. We believe it will possess peculiar attractions for the better class of readers, and for every cultivated home. Some of the departments announced to be embraced therein are those relating to Philosophy, Politics, Science, Religion and Morality, Fiction, Art, History. It will record and emphasize from an impartial and patriotic standpoint what is best in American nationality, politics and institutions, including the great philanthropic and economic efforts of the time.

"The New Princeton Review" will be published six times a year by A. C. Armstrong & Son, of New York, and Hodder & Stoughton, London, under the editorial management of William M. Sloane, Professor of History in Princeton College. Provision has been made to secure the best writers at home and abroad for the discussion of important topics, also for the departments of fiction, biography, travel and belles-lettres in general.
